Northampton – a brief glimpse through time

The earliest evidence of a human settlement in Northampton was around 4000 BC at Briar Hill. Around 43AD the Romans occupied the area which they then abandoned and the invading Saxons, then Danes came and went (and unfortunately left us with the Carlsberg brewery!).

Renowned for its long standing royal connections, pivotal historic events punctuate the county's history. In the War of the Roses, Henry VI was captured in the Battle of Northampton. Two monuments at Naseby mark the site of the battle in which Charles I was defeated, a turning point in the English Civil War.

Northampton survived two devastating fires in 1516 and 1675 and lost nearly half its population to the Black Death. Nevertheless, the town recovered and continued to grow and prosper. From the 17th century until the 19th century the chief industry of Northampton was shoe-making, along with brewing in the 1800s (a comfortable walk home after a few drinks!). The Albion brewery has recently opened in the town centre brewing Phipps beer preserving a tradition over 200 years old (Phipps IPA is highly recommended!).

In 1809 Spencer Perceval became the only MP for Northampton ever to be elected prime minister, which he held until 1812 when he became the only UK prime minister ever to be assassinated!

Northampton was a revolutionary and free-thinking town often at odds with the church and the state, shoemakers in particular being known for their strong non-conformist and radical traditions. A protestant shoemaker was burned at the stake because of his beliefs during the reign of the Catholic Queen Mary. In the 1600's men and women were executed for witchcraft. In the late 1700's a public execution of the notorious Culworth gang for robberies was watched by an estimated 10,000 people.

The first Earl of Northampton, Simon de Senlis, built a fine Norman Castle which became very popular and important to both royalty and heads of state. This resulted in Northampton becoming the Capital of England for 200 years, and the castle became the Seat of Parliament. It was the scene of many sieges and was chosen for the trial of Thomas a Becket, Archbishop of Canterbury in 1164. The castle was not destroyed in the Great Fire of 1675 since it had already been pulled down by Charles II. Charles II was exiled to France following the execution of Charles I. When he returned from exile, he decided to reduce the status and power of the town as punishment for its disloyalty during the English Civil War (The town turned against the monarch, Charles I, in 1642 and sided with Cromwell. Their eventual reward was an unpaid bill for the thousands of boots they had made for his army). He did this in 1660 by tearing down the castle and its walls.

Strangely, following the Great Fire, it was also Charles II who arranged for the town to receive enough money, timber and resources to rebuild All Saints Church. Built in 1680, the church still dominates Northampton's town centre, and carries a statue of Charles II above its portico. Interestingly, the statue depicts Charles II dressed in a Roman toga, supposedly because the townsfolk did not wish for the statue to be placed there. They were obliged to display a statue, and this was their way of expressing their annoyance.

In more recent times Princess Diana spent her childhood here at Althorp House where she was laid to rest in 1997. The 1960s saw a huge influx into the town thanks to a massive program of public housing. The town now is a thriving place for business, one reason being its central location.

On a sporting front the town has a football, rugby and cricket team. The football team "The Cobblers" play at Sixfields Stadium in Division 1. The rugby team, Northampton Saints, play at Franklins Gardens in the Gallagher Premiership and won the title for the second time in 2024. The cricket team were promoted to Division 1 of the County Championship in 2019.
